

KANSAS LEGISLATIVE INSIGHTS NEWSLETTER | MARCH 29, 2019

As expected, Gov. Kelly's first veto was SB 22, which would decouple Kansas income tax from the federal income tax code, resulting in an estimated reduction of state revenue by $550 million in a three-year period. SB 22 did not pass either chamber with enough votes to override the Governor's veto. In her veto message, Gov. Kelly stated, "[SB 22] would throw our state once again into a self-inflicted budget crisis, diminishing all the investments we've worked so hard to rebuild and restore." Republican leaders said the bill would have prevented unintended tax increases on businesses and individuals.

Both chambers had three days to complete their work before the March 27 deadline to consider non-exempt bills not in the originating chamber. On Monday, the House of Representatives scheduled 37 bills for debate but did not finish all of them due to political reasons, plus running into their self-imposed midnight deadline to end debate. House leadership members could not muster enough votes for their school finance bill, which funded only two years of the four recommended by the Supreme Court. Gov. Kelly recommended and the Senate approved four years of funding for school finance in an effort to comply with the Kansas Supreme Court guidelines expressed in the school-finance litigation commonly referred to as Gannon. School finance will be negotiated in a House-Senate conference committee next week.

On Monday, the House of Representatives passed its budget plan that includes $50 million for the Kansas Department for Aging and Disability Services to enhance services for the elderly, disabled, and foster care, along with a 2.5% pay increase for state employees. The conference committee on the mega-budget that will be used as the base budget met twice on Wednesday and will meet again next Tuesday. There were more than 130 conference able differences between the House and Senate versions of the budget. At the first meeting, the Senate acceded to 23 House positions. During the second meeting, the House accepted the Senate offer, then acceded to 21 positions taken by the Senate. As more challenging differences arise, further progress may be slower. Importantly, however, the budget compromise process is underway.

Both Houses passed industrial hemp bills by wide margins. On Wednesday, the Senate passed legislation sought by law enforcement and utility companies compelling scrap-yard dealers to share information with the KBI database about individuals selling steel, copper, aluminum, and other metals. The Senate approved freezing property taxes for elderly Kansans who have a household income less than $50,000 and own a residence valued at less than $350,000.

The Legislature is on a four-day weekend. After April 5 ("Drop-Dead Day"), the Legislature is adjourned until May 1. Next week will be devoted to conference committees trying to iron out differences between the House and Senate versions of various bills.

CORPORATE PRACTICE UPDATE

A new "corporate practice of medicine" bill emerged last week. Stakeholder negotiations have been difficult, but a compromise was orchestrated by House Health and Human Services Chair Brenda Landwehr.
