WEEK 5 – LEGISLATORS SHARPENING FOCUS ON ECONOMY

Lawmakers are shaping the state's future through debates on taxes, wages, property appraisals, and government authority. Republicans are pushing for tax cuts and deregulation, while Democrats advocate for higher wages and stronger public programs. As businesses seek economic incentives and lawmakers weigh economic policies, their decisions will have lasting effects on the economy and governance of Kansas.

DUELING PROPOSALS FROM NATIONAL PARTIES

Kansas Republican lawmakers announced on Feb. 3 plans to exempt tips from state income tax, aligning with a federal proposal backed by President Donald Trump. Kansas Senate President Ty Masterson (R-Andover) and U.S. Senator Roger Marshall (R-Kansas) argued the change would provide financial relief for service workers with minimal impact on state revenue.

Sen. Caryn Tyson (R-Parker) estimated the proposal could cost Kansas between $4 million and $10 million annually. U.S. Sen. Marshall, supporting a federal version with U.S. Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), said the move is part of a broader effort to extend Trump-era tax cuts.

Two days later, on Feb. 5, Kansas Democrats, led by Governor Laura Kelly, responded with a plan to raise the state's minimum wage to $15 an hour, up from $7.25, and increase the base wage for tipped workers to $7.50. They argue that higher wages offer more meaningful relief than tax exemptions.

Sen. Masterson dismissed the wage hike as a "big government" policy that could hurt businesses. Economists warn tax-free tips could encourage wage reclassification, complicating revenue forecasts.

This debate underscores Kansas' ongoing effort to mirror federal economic policies, shaping the state's fiscal future.

FILM TAX BREAKS BACK

Kansas lawmakers are renewing efforts to attract filmmakers with tax incentives, but the proposal faces hurdles. The House Committee on Taxation reviewed House Bill 2038, which offers production companies up to $10 million annually in tax credits, covering 30% of production and postproduction costs.

With property tax relief as the Legislature's priority, the bill's future is uncertain. Committee Chair Representative Adam Smith (R-Weskan) voiced skepticism, as well as Vice Chair Rep. Carl Turner (R-Leawood), who cited studies showing limited economic benefits from similar programs.

Filmmaker Kristen "Kiki" Bush urged action, warning that Kansas is losing creative talent. Justin Rorabough of Wichita State echoed Bush's concerns, noting graduates leave for better opportunities. Without incentives, Bush said, future film projects in Kansas are unlikely.

COSTS QUESTIONED ON TAX INCENTIVES

On Feb. 4, the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee reviewed a Legislative Post Audit report, raising concerns about the cost and oversight of economic incentives, including the High Performance Incentive Program (HPIP) and state housing tax credits.

The audit found HPIP generates $2.91 in economic activity per $1 in foregone tax revenue but returns only 35 cents to the state. Lawmakers questioned the lack of reporting on exempted sales tax and the program's 16-year carry-forward provision.

Discussion on housing tax credits focused on rising costs, with no cap in place. Chair Sen. Caryn Tyson (R-Parker) noted a House proposal to repeal the affordable housing tax credit, signaling growing legislative scrutiny and potential reforms ahead.

SENATE APPROVES APPRAISAL CAP, HOUSE GOES OWN WAY

The Kansas Senate approved a constitutional amendment Thursday to cap annual property appraisal increases at 3% for tax purposes, clearing the chamber with a 28-11 vote. Two Democrats backed the measure, while five Republicans opposed it.

Proponents say the cap will rein in rising property taxes, but critics warn it could create inequities in property values and hinder local government revenue. The amendment's future in the House remains unclear, as lawmakers there have expressed reservations about its long-term effects.

House Republicans are considering an alternative approach that would base appraisal increases on a multi-year average rather than a fixed cap. Supporters of the House plan argue that this method would better account for market fluctuations while maintaining stability for taxpayers.

Senate President Ty Masterson (R-Andover) acknowledged the House's interest in addressing rising valuations but questioned whether an averaging formula would provide enough protection for property owners.

The amendment, if approved by the Legislature, would go before voters in November.

LAWMAKERS MOVE TO CURB HEALTH POWERS

The Kansas Senate Public Health and Welfare Committee reviewed two bills this week aimed at restricting public health officials' authority, reigniting debates over personal freedoms, public safety, and business rights.

Senate Bill 19, the Conscientious Right to Refuse Act, would bar discrimination against individuals who decline medical interventions and revoke the Kansas Department of Health and Environment's (KDHE) quarantine authority. Supporters, including parents and advocacy groups, argue it protects personal choice. Opponents, including health officials and education leaders, warn it could weaken herd immunity and increase disease outbreaks. The Kansas Chamber of Commerce also opposes the bill, arguing it limits businesses' ability to enforce workplace safety policies.

Senate Bill 29 seeks to further curb state and local health officials' authority, preventing them from ordering quarantines and removing schools' obligation to report infectious diseases. Supporters, frustrated by pandemic-era restrictions, say it reins in government overreach. Melissa Campbell, a frequent advocate of similar measures, criticized KDHE as "full of unelected bureaucrats." Public health officials counter that limiting their authority could undermine disease prevention and public health safeguards.

Despite strong testimony on both sides, lawmakers took no action on either bill this week.
